WORLD HISTORY STANDARDS BINGO

Directions: To see how the same trends, patterns and concepts you study in global history are repeated in our world today, find one related article, editorial, graphic, or photo example in The New York Times for each item below, and write in a headline or description. When you have a diagonal, horizontal or vertical row of examples, you have "BINGO!"

Each of the concepts in the squares below was taken from the McRel Standards for World History, found at www.mcrel.org

Causes, consequences and/or major patterns of international migration	Efforts to improve political and social conditions around the world	Scientific and technological innovations and their global impact	How the character and functions of cities change over time	Characteristics of capitalism and the capitalistic system compared with other economic systems
How ideals of freedom, equality, justice and citizenship have changed over time and across societies	Ways in which human action has contributed to long-term change in the natural environment	Family and gender roles in societies	Impact of increasing global economic interdependence	Role of education in societies
How feminist movements and social conditions affect the lives of women around the world	Social class structure and interactions	FREE SPACE	Effects of major disease pandemics	Role of ethnicity, cultural identity, and religious beliefs in shaping economic and political conflicts across the globe
"Fundamentalism" and the growth of militant religious movements	Cultural trends and their global impact and implications	Religion and belief systems and their effects on different societies	Causes and effects of economic imbalances and social inequalities among the world's people	Effects of modern communication on consumer tastes and demands in different parts of the world
Political movements and their ideologies, development and structure	Examples of consumer culture	Impact of the environment on society	Contemporary importance of historical documents, treaties, and agreements	Legacy of classical civilizations and ideals
